

The 2010 Ibrahim Index , published today, shows that overall governance performance in Africa is being driven by gains in economic and human development but undermined by democratic recession. The Index measures the delivery of public goods and services to citizens by governments and non-state actors across 88 indicators related to sustainable economic opportunity (covering private sector, infrastructure, environment, and public management), safety and rule of law, participation and human rights, and human development.